General Background

David Austin is a leading lawyer in British Columbia in the field of energy, and electricity in particular, and structuring private public partnership infrastructure projects, such as roads, bridges, water and wastewater plants.

David has appeared before regulatory bodies on energy matters and was the legal advisor to the developer of British Columbia's first private public partnership. He has extensive experience with energy project development, such as private transmission lines, corporate structures, project finance, intertie access and formation of government policy. David has also provided advice on the development of B.C.'s first independent power project and wind farm, and was an expert legal witness in a dispute under the North American Free Trade Agreement.

In addition, David practiced law in London, England, advising on international capital market and banking transactions, including project finance, direct debt and debt/equity issues, commercial paper programs, swaps and equipment leasing. He very actively participated in the development of the first securitizations in the London market.

David is a speaker at numerous conferences in the U.S. and Canada and a regular contributor to various forms of media. He has also been awarded the Clean Energy Association of B.C. Life Time Achievement Award.
